Who is in control of your future profits?

asks Seema Sharma

It looks like £60-£80 billion of NHS funds may be handed to general practitioners by the commissioners for them to be responsible for their own budgets and cutting out layers and layers of middle management.

Responsibility will be handed to GPs working in local groups, who will commission services or provide them by working in rotas with each other. The health secretary Mr Lansley believes that if GPs are responsible for their own budgets and have to come out of-hours care, most will decide to go back to offering weekend and evening cover themselves or in local groups.

At present, funds are given by the Government to PCTs, which pay for patients from their area to be treated in hospital. Under new plans, GPs – who are currently not responsible for paying for hospital care – will have to figure out how to allocate the money instead and pay the hospitals directly for each patient they refer!

As dentists, we have spent the last three years bemoaning the UDA system and the general lack of understanding of what it costs to run a successful dental practice. What would happen if we were given the same opportunity as GPs? Is there a glimmer of hope that we might hold our own funding too in the future, and if so would we feel the same, or would we be in the hands of clinicians, dentistry would make the headlines for the right reasons instead of the wrong reasons?

Last year, my PCT Tower Hamlets set up the first dental practice-based commissioning group in the country, of which I am co-chair. It has been a journey of revelation for my colleagues and I, and we have realised the opportunities are enormous, as are the responsibilities. We now have experienced managers is an important IT looks like £60-£80 billion of NHS funds may be handed to general practitioners by the commissioners for them to be responsible for their own budgets and cutting out layers and layers of middle management.

Responsibility will be handed to GPs working in local groups, who will commission services or provide them by working in rotas with each other. The health secretary Mr Lansley believes that if GPs are responsible for their own budgets and have to come out of-hours care, most will decide to go back to offering weekend and evening cover themselves or in local groups.

At present, funds are given by the Government to PCTs, which pay for patients from their area to be treated in hospital. Under new plans, GPs – who are currently not responsible for paying for hospital care – will have to figure out how to allocate the money instead and pay the hospitals directly for each patient they refer!

As dentists, we have spent the last three years bemoaning the UDA system and the general lack of understanding of what it costs to run a successful dental practice. What would happen if we were given the same opportunity as GPs? Is there a glimmer of hope that we might hold our own funding too in the future, and if so would we feel the same, or would we be in the hands of clinicians, dentistry would make the headlines for the right reasons instead of the wrong reasons?

Last year, my PCT Tower Hamlets set up the first dental practice-based commissioning group in the country, of which I am co-chair. It has been a journey of revelation for my colleagues and I, and we have realised the opportunities are enormous, as are the responsibilities. We now have experienced managers and we came to realise that huge chunks of our budgets were being gobbled up - specialist opinions for patients with rare or complex conditions, or general periodontal opinions for patients with localised gingivitis, might be we tempted to avoid keep more patients in and using some of that funding in our practices?

Perhaps we could develop a GDS for dentists, similar to the CPA, for housekeeping, screening and upselling ourselves. Perhaps we would allocate funds for DCPs to work on the NHS in general practice, freeing the dentist up to concentrate on more technical work and reserving expertise for them.

Perhaps we would buy in fluoride toothpaste for dentists to give away, keeping the best of the antiseptic to caries.

For some time we would still have to concentrate on the ravages of damage that already exist in our ageing population and in vain attempt to incentivise the use of dentists with special interests and specialists in primary care. This would bring higher skills and funds into practices, and provide patients with a better choice of services under one roof. Perhaps we would fulfil the access barriers by taking back control of care - evening care and weekend care, instead of offering to keep nurses at work, away from their children until 9pm every night, in our desperate bid to win NHS tenders. Would we spend huge amounts of performance management or would we move from a stick based to a carrot based approach?

In fact any and all of these are possible – we could do things differently, we could do different things and we could do things for different people – and all of them could work if they were correctly funded.

The reality in any dental practice is that if we get practice revenue numbers right, cutting salaries and personnel costs and causing disenchantment throughout the practice would not be necessary. Practices have base costs which are impossible to circumvent – the fixed costs of equipment and premises, and those of compliance and a core complement of staff.

The financial profile of a dental practice is not rocket science. Sadly, when figures of 25-40 per cent profit are reported, and dentists are considered greedy, a little investigation shows financial naïveté not greed. Clinical costs are small business costs, and an inability on the part of the assessors to interpret practice figures - a job that accountants and practice managers could probably do on the back of an envelope.

Many dentists own the premises they work in – if they rented their premises to another dentist to run the practice, as landlords they would receive rental income from their investment in property, and the tenant would show a lower practice profit. However because practice owners do not charge themselves rent, they mistakenly count the “rent savings” as “dental practice profit”, when it is actually direct return on investment in property and nothing to do with the practice per se.

The other source of extra perceived “profit” is a direct result of practice owners providing a significant chunk of clinical services themselves, when the practice owner working in the business as a clinician throws his own blood, sweat and tears into the profit area, too, so dentists are horrified to learn that if they paid themselves the same rate they paid their associates, the profit figures for the practice would look unsustainable. This dependence on the owner of the practice has resulted in smaller practices being particularly hard hit recently. Along with the economic crisis, the reality of reallocating work to DCPs, reallocating clinical time to unfunded administration, or engaging more experienced managers is an impact on the bottom line.

Would you like to increase your revenue streams, prepare for a new way of working under the new government, meet the regulations of Care Quality Commission and be in control of your own profits? Email the author at seema.sharma@dentalbyte.co.uk or log onto www.dentalbyte.co.uk to find out more about our PEP conference on 1st October 2010, when Seema, Andy Action of Frank Taylor Associates and Kevin Lewis of Dental Protection will take you through the secrets of succeeding in the changing clinical and commercial environment by “pepping up your practice”.

About the author

Seema Sharma qualified as a dentist but gave up clinical work after 10 years in practice to go into full time practice management. Today she runs three practices, including one which is a multi-disciplinary specialist centre. Seema established Dentalbyte Ltd to provide affordable “real-world” practice management programmes to help practice owners keep pace with the changing clinical and commercial environment facing them today. Visit www.dentalbyte.co.uk to register for updates on practice management or email Seema at seema.sharma@dentalbyte.co.uk to find out more.

FUTURE PROOF YOUR PRACTICE

FRIDAY 1ST OCTOBER 2010

Join us for a day conference on the changing world of both NHS and private dentistry, including:

*CQC
+Future commissioning and performance management
goodwill protection

Confirmed speakers:

Seema Sharma of Dentalbyte: An advocate of combining organisational leadership with clinical leadership for success, practice owner Seema is uniquely placed to discuss her pragmatic practice management solutions which have been instrumental in improving her vision in her own NHS and private practices.

Andy Action of Frank Taylor Associates: With their uniquely accurate and detailed dental practice evaluation reports, Frank Tayler have emerged as leading practice consultants, with extensive knowledge of the dental sector, Andy will impart a wealth of guidance to help practice owners.

Kevin Lewis of Dental Protection: Kevin spent 30 years in full time general practice and has written a book on dental practice management. He was appointed dental director at Dental Protection in 1998, and will explore the future balance in the dental care commercial interface to practice.

PRICE: £295 per delegate. To include refreshments, lunch and detailed conference folder with invaluable CQC and dental practice management guidance.

Book online at www.dentalbyte.co.uk or call 020 8297 9100

6 hours verifiable CPD